Exhibition statement

I'd like to think I'm self-aware enough to appreciate the feeling of being young and realise how good I've got it. But this phase of early adulthood can feel like a constant choice between clutching on to a good thing for as long as possible, or using the inertia to hurtle towards the next.

There are things to be done, places to be seen, adventures to be had. It has to be now, not just because what might be our best days are numbered, but because all our days are numbered. And of course, if you've ever found someone who feels the urgent need to go and do – and leave – then those traits of theirs are all part of why you want so badly for them to stay.

I usually want to luxuriate in these moments a little, or wish I could freeze them in time, but the next thing and the next people await. Everybody is moving off in a different direction, so you better get going too.

Tim has the foresight to capture these moments; for many of us, the urge arrives too late and has already morphed into nostalgia. This exhibition is a representative span of the years, places, and people that constitute our collective young adulthood.
